Thrive Online: A New Approach to Building Expertise and Confidence as an Online Educator
Well-designed and facilitated online courses involve interaction between not only students and the content but also students and other students as well as students and faculty members.
Design models in general are not dependent on a particular mode of delivery; they can operate in most cases as well online as in class.

In an increasingly volatile, uncertain, complex and ambiguous world, we need design models for teaching that are light and nimble.
Which quality indicators or metrics are important to be aware of?
What are your thoughts about current and evolving models including blended, hyflex, and the many variations?
Not all courses can be easily moved online. What are some effective examples or alternatives?
How can faculty with little or no online education experience best prepare to teach remotely this fall?

What are some principles of teaching in the digital age?
What would you recommend for academic leaders in the 2020-21 academic year?
